MARC HANSON

Changing seasons

Working outdoors on location is vital to the work of Marc Hanson. The visual experience of being there enables him to better reference that moment once he's back in the studio.

"Painting from life is critical for a landscape painter," he says. "It takes a while to acclimate to the studio; I get cabin fever before I've been in the cabin very long."

In Hanson's first solo show this summer at Addison Art Gallery, he presents nearly two dozen landscape paintings, half of which will be plein air pieces done just prior to the exhibition, of Cape Cod and Minnesota, where the artist resides.

Equally proficient in oils and pastels, this grouping is water-oriented, reflective of the Cape's shore environment and the artist's residence off the St. Croix River.

"I'm interested in the seasonal changes a lot," says Hanson. "The atmospheric changes are nurturing to me more than the area itself... what's new about the light and color this time that I didn't see last time I was there."

Some people call Hanson the "sky man" because he loves to paint weather, skies and atmosphere. To keep that label at bay, he'll occasionally do a scene like that in Red Wing Reflections, an early spring plein air piece using subtle, almost monochromatic, color.

"My love of the land, the Midwest in

The Collector Says . . .

"Marc is just so good at what he does. For me, he's a painter's painter: passionate, prolific and able. He captures the moment elegantly and seemingly with ease."

particular, and my desire to communicate that deep seeded love is what drives my work," says Hanson. "My purpose is not to replicate the specific or dwell on the spectacular as much as it is to observe the specific and to discover the beauty in the seemingly unspectacular." ●
