

Frank Gardner:

Using a Premixed Palette

For many workshop students, the biggest challenge is knowing how to start a painting so it has the promise of being successful. Frank Gardner, an American now living in Mexico, focused a recent workshop on a dependable method to begin a plein air landscape: start with a premixed palette.

by Molly Siple

Frank Gardner took workshop students to a number of picturesque locations around San Miguel de Allende, Mexico.

Gardner showed students how to pre-mix the colors of walls, plant materials, and buildings before beginning to paint.

A small group of artists from various parts of the United States and Mexico gathered in the Mexican town of San Miguel de Allende last year to study plein air painting with Frank Gardner, an expatriate who is happily ensconced with his family in central Mexico on the high plains of Guanajuato.

Student Critiques

"This painting uses an interesting arrangement of shapes, some large and some small, to make a statement about the location," said the instructor. "It is more about the subtle color differences and textures than the details. I suggest a clearer separation of light and shadow in the left foreground and middle ground to indicate strong sunlight and give a clearer entrance into the main area of the painting."

"The effort to concentrate on color mixing with the limited palette paid off," said Gardner. "The simple design was made stronger by linking the shadow from the tree on the left to the red barrel. But the shadow from the barrel on the right could have gone off the canvas instead of being squeezed in by the limitations of the edge. The next step here could be to continue eliminating the remaining white spots of the canvas with subtle variations of the background colors, being careful not to break up the strong design with too many value changes."

"This is a nice gestural study of horses," said Gardner. "The artist was painting a much more complex scene on a different panel but was feeling a bit overwhelmed by the subtle color and moving horse, so he wisely chose to put the other painting aside and concentrate on one aspect of the scene—the horses."

"This student got a little caught up in spotty details and lost the strong pattern of light and shadow that he had at the start," the instructor commented. "There is also the look of random dabbling with the brush without a sure plan. The artist should simplify the main shapes again to strengthen the design. I would also suggest saving the brightest color and strongest contrast of color for somewhere near the center of interest. The bright orange of the tiles on the middle left attracts my eye, but then there is no reward there."

Demonstration: Patsy's Cart

Reference

Gardner chose this scene because he wanted to demonstrate how to paint a big mass in shadow with its silhouette as the focal point. The artist opted to paint on an untuned canvas, in part because he was looking into the bright sunlight. He premixed a lot of the block-in colors and used a few grays left over from the previous day's painting session.

Step 1

The artist massed in the cart shape with no preliminary sketch and only depicted certain palm trees behind the cart that would serve his composition. He was not interested in accurately describing each item hanging off the cart—he only sought to capture their silhouettes. By keeping the background very light, the emphasis remained on the cart in shadow.

Step 2

Gardner did not count the spokes when he quickly laid them in. "The numbers will take care of themselves," he said. A few lines reinforced the shape of the silhouette, then he scraped all of his shadow colors off to the side for use as "mud" colors. The artist turned his attention to the light colors in the background, and he let several light values mingle on his brush to create varied passages of color on his canvas.

Step 3

Next, Gardner filled the foreground with neutral colors for rocks and some peachy-pinks to act as a complement against the green grass. With the canvas covered, the artist began to adjust shapes, colors, and values to create a pleasing whole that would read correctly in terms of form and atmosphere.

Step 4

Finally, the artist added the highlights. To start, he cleaned an area of his palette to keep the highlight mixtures pure. Gardner reminded himself to stay calm as he added these critical details—they required precise brushstrokes. He twisted the tip of a small brush in the color mixture. Gardner held the brush above the canvas and practiced the strokes he planned to use several times before actually making the marks. He reminded students to use a variety of highlight colors for the different areas of the painting.

Student Critiques

“The idea here was to get a quick start with a variety of shapes and some fairly accurate color mixing,” Gardner said. “There is a good separation of light and shadow, which was the main goal, but a next step could be to go back and start breaking up the big simple shapes with color changes (rather than value changes) and to adjust some drawing issues.”

“This painting has a problem with the aerial perspective, with all of its subtle color differences,” said Gardner. The instructor told the student to look away from the scene and rest his eyes, then look back at what is in front of him and make a decision about the color. He explains that these problems were the result of looking too hard at the distance and the artist painting what he knew rather than what he saw. He told him to make the foreground greens yellower than the greens farther away, explaining that in aerial perspective, yellow drops

About the Artist

Frank Gardner earned a B.F.A. in painting from the Rhode Island School of Design, in Providence. After four years of pursuing abstract painting, collage, and mixed media—and working as a house painter—the opportunity came to spend three months in San Miguel de Allende, teaching employees at a furniture factory how to apply faux finishes. During this stint, Gardner was offered the chance to house-sit for an additional few months, and he's lived in San Miguel ever since. With a wealth of subjects to paint and the time and means to master plein air, Gardner has become an accomplished artist. Nine years ago he opened his own gallery from which he sells his work to a wide range of international collectors. He also makes a painting trip back to New England once or twice a year for a change of scenery and to re-energize his work. For more information on the artist, visit www.frankgardner.com.
